THE SUBSURFACE OF MUSIC

"Interdisciplinary," a comfortable word for cooperation between departments that wish to preserve their autonomy, is a term readily applicable to a little known and highly specialized field of study on this campus, ethnomusicology. The analysis of music in terms of the social structures in which it evolves demands considerable knowledge in the disciplines of music and anthropology.

Since ethnomusicology is a rather modern academic pursuit, its significance having been realized only at the turn of this century, it now grapples with the problem of priorities. Should emphasis be placed on anthropology to discover how music becomes a social indicator? Should a musical system itself be studied in order to see if there is something that reveals definite facts about the nature of a given people? In the Department of Anthropology, we have two avid ethnomusicologists and each relies on one of these two approaches.

Michael Asch, Assistant Professor in the Department, approaches his work from the standpoint of anthropology. He follows in the tradition of the first professional pioneer studies carried out in the twenties and thirties among American Indian groups. One of Dr. Asch's chief interests is in understanding how the social organization of certain Indian communities is incorporated in and reflected by musical occasions such as the Drum Dance song.

His analysis involves establishing a set of social contexts and collecting a corpus of compositions and then examining similarities and differences in the music sound structure that relate to the society. This approach, he says, is necessary and not uncommon in ethnomusicology. Many ethnic groups do not describe their music in terms of composition and theory but in terms of social context. His findings have been exceedingly complex.

One of his theories can be stated briefly; but it should be noted that this explanation is simplified. For the group Dr. Asch has worked with, the objective of a musical occasion is to achieve the ideal Drum Dance and this involves the participation of all members of the group in the ritual. The main purpose is to remove any distinction between leader and follower. When this mediation occurs a "special world of harmony" is created.

However, Dr. Asch stresses that it is the process of the Drum Dance ceremony that is of utmost importance; the outcome is always uncertain and the ideal is not always achieved. While his research is still in progress, he believes that the musical occasions of the group he is analyzing parallel, in some way, the problems and conflicts or the unity and harmony of that society at a specific time. The dance is a manifestation of the conditions of daily life.

Regula Qureshi, who studies with Michael Asch, approaches her work from the point of view of music. Much of her studies have taken place in India under the guidance of an Ustad, or music teacher. Ms. Qureshi first began with a stylistic comparison of the Indian sarangi and the Western cello. At that time, she admits, it was a purely technical pursuit.

Now, however, she is analyzing India's classical music tradition. Unlike Dr. Asch, her work is based, to a large degree, on written compositions which are performed by professionals in a hierarchical, feudal society. Herself an accomplished performer of East Indian music, Regula Qureshi notes the importance of actually being involved in ritual. Intuition must be developed for a more complete understanding; in fact, it must eventually take over so that the performer becomes one with the religious event. The difficulty rests in maintaining one's critical and analytical faculties.

Ms. Qureshi's principle interest is in religious Sufi music. An analysis of the Sufi mystic song involves an understanding of a living religion, a religion that is performed. The musician is the medium through which union with a saint is achieved. The worshipper gives his offering to the musician.

The thought level, that is, the analysis of Sufi music itself, has been very well documented. However, Ms. Qureshi suggests that how and why the music is played in a religious ceremony have yet to be explored. Given that fact that India is a feudal society and that the musician performs for an aristocracy, she hopes to find a correlation between performer, type of music chosen, and the one for whom it is performed. There is, she says, a definite and complex ethnomusicological pattern.

The nature of the life of a people can be found through the study of music. However, the study of music now emphasizes only performance, analysis, and theory. Ethnomusicology is a field that must have serious students of music. The University and the departments concerned should consider seriously the advantages of developing a more sophisticated program of interdisciplinary studies in ethnomusicology. And to begin, Dr. Asch is thinking of course work that would pursue the social, political, and economic implications behind Western music.

RED CROSS CLINIC

On 22 November, the Red Cross Blood Transfusion Service will return to the University to hold clinics at Lister Hall and HUB. At Lister Hall, the clinic will be in operation from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. and from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. from 22 to 26 November. On Friday, 26 November, the clinic at Lister Hall will close at 5 p.m. On 22, 24, and 26 November at HUB, a blood donor clinic will operate between the hours of 2 p.m. and 5 p.m. On Friday, 26 November, the clinic will close at 4 p.m.

As the Christmas season approaches, the need for blood increases. The Red Cross Blood Transfusion Service urges everyone to take the time to come and give blood. Anyone in reasonable health between the ages of eighteen and sixty-five can give blood approximately four times a year. Last year, University donors gave 1,862 units of blood; it is hoped that this year that figure can be exceeded by at least five hundred pints.

Later in the month, on 29 November, another blood donor clinic will begin at the University in the Students' Union Building. That clinic will run until 3 December. Its hours of operation will be from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. and from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m.

For more information about donating blood or about the clinics to be held at the University, telephone Red Cross House at 429-2671.

DEAN OF STUDENTS NOMINATIONS DATE EXTENDED

The Selection Committee for the Dean of Students has extended its deadline for applications and nominations to Monday, 29 November.

The committee is seeking an academic for this position with a strong interest in working with people. Administrative experience or potential would be helpful.

The new Dean will probably retain a fractional appointment in the teaching faculty of her or his origin, although the duties of the deanship will undoubtedly occupy the incumbent almost full-time initially. This will be a term appointment for three to five years. The office of the Dean of Students will be in temporary quarters initially, pending a move into Athabasca Hall together with other student services when that building is ready for occupancy.

Both men and women are invited to apply for the position of Dean of Students by contacting Jean Lauber, Associate Vice-President (Academic), 3-2 University Hall.
